Customer Reviews

It's partly my own fault for being in a hurry & only reading the reviews, not the item description, but I found out the hard way that this is not the novel but the supplemental teacher's manual. I ended up not needing the book anyway, so I'm not sure how helpful this manual would have been in understanding the book.

I am a World War One vet. This is the best book I ever read about war. It tells the importances of life and death. It tells how it is to see a brutal war it is a very good book, but I would think that after know what it's like that if you had a grandpa in World War One, be should grateful of that.

I feel that the main character, Paul, committed suicide. His thoughts in the last chapter were something along the line of, 'I have nothing to believe in, all of my friends are dead, I've seen more than enough sites and have had more than enough experiences than I need in a life time, so why should I go on.' This is along the thought line of someone who is so utterly depressed that he would easily contemplate suicide, let alone do the terrible act. Another reason I feel this way is because Paul is one of the most experienced guys around in trench warfare. In the book, it explains that the recruits suffer the most casualties because they have no idea how high a bullet is because of the sound, what kind of shell is traveling through the air at the moment, and at what time is it safe to take off your gas-mask. Paul had survived three years of this loathesome bloodshed while relying on his experience. He would not be the type of person who would mysteriously fall in battle in one of the dullest days in World War I, deemed 'All Quiet On The Western Front.' The book also stated that when the men found him in the trench he had a total expression of calm, like all of his stress had been relieved and that the end had finally come.
